ABSTRACT

This project will concentrate on particular supporting points: the results of comparing the VRT method against traditional therapy, the critical components within the VRT that bring down anxiety, and the longitudinal effects on anxiety management and general well-being. Furthermore, individual traits like race, gender, and anxiety severity will be examined for their influence on treatment results. Although the study aims to investigate the practical implementation problems of VR, it will not pay much attention to the technical concerns of virtual reality development or the economic feasibility involved in adopting this technology, as these issues are out of the study's scope.
